Works in Progress:

Book

“Making Amends: The New Politics of Global Reparations”

Status: This book project is a product of a twenty-year project on global reparations in world politics. I was recently awarded a residential fellowship at the Woodrow Wilson Center for International Scholars in Washington, D.C. (from April-August) to conduct additional research for this book. My archival research focused on several global reparations efforts connected to major conflicts in international relations. I am now focused on writing the book. I was required to give a fellows presentation on this work as well as be available for consulting on this topic while I was a fellow there.

Articles

“Attitudes Towards Transitional Justice in Lebanon” (with Faten Ghosn, University of Arizona)

*Status: Accepted for presentation at ISA. This paper is part of Faten and Alex Braithwaite’s Minerva grant funded project on transitional justice in Lebanon. We focus on survey data related to reparations for Syrian refugees in Lebanon.

“Diasporas and Reparations Politics”

*Status: Invited to participate in a special issue of the Journal of the Center for Policy Analysis and Research (JCPAR). A journal of the Congressional Black Caucus Foundation. This paper compares reparations efforts across African-Americans in the U.S., Caribbean states, and African states.

“Transitional Justice in the U.S.: Restorative Justice for Police Brutality in Chicago Police Torture (with Brooke Abrams)

*Status: This paper is a case study of recent reparations in the Chicago Police Torture case. It is part of a broader project on reparations and police brutality in the U.S. that we presented at the Center for Social Policy at UNM.

Transitional Justice in Africa: The Landscape of Reparations Efforts Across the Region. (with Claire Crawford, University of Southern California)

*Status: We began data collection on African reparations efforts from 1990-2019 last summer. This paper examines the variation in reparations efforts across the African continent and the consequences for conflict and human rights in the region.

“The International Dimensions of Transitional Justice in New Mexico and the U.S. Southwest” (Adrianna Lerma)

*Status: Started data collection on transitional justice in New Mexico and the broader U.S. Southwest this semester as part of Adrianna’s RA assignment. This paper focuses on the international and domestic elements of transitional justice in New Mexico and the broader U.S. Southwest.

Techniques of Political Analysis and Politics of Global Problems (Statistics class for undergraduate Political Science majors at Ohio State University) I taught this class as a graduate student.

*Interdisciplinary Courses*The Architecture of Justice (Study Abroad course)

This course was taught in Berlin, Germany during June-July 2015 as well as June 2017. I will teach it again during July 2019. I co-created and co-taught the course with Prof. Kristina Yu, UNM School of Architecture. She is a practicing architect and a scholar of memory and design. Tim Green, an alumnus of our graduate program, is also an instructor in the course. His focus is in international criminal law as well as transitional justice and education. He is now a doctoral student in the School of Education and a teacher at the Bosque School. Cory Greenfield, a practicing architect and adjunct faculty member of the School of Architecture, is part of the faculty for this course. He has also designed memory sites around the world. He worked for one of the firms who participated in the architectural competition for the National African-American Museum in Washington, D.C. Students who have taken the course include graduate and undergraduate students in Architecture, Planning and Political Science. In July 2019, the course will be taught in Albuquerque, Washington, D.C. and Berlin, Germany. For the portion of the course taught in Washington, D.C., lectures will be held in the Department of Government at Georgetown University. The focus of the course will be on transitional justice in the U.S. while we are in Washington, D.C., and transitional justice globally while in Berlin.

The course focuses on the role of architecture and city planning in conducting mass human rights violations and conversely their role in memory efforts like museums, memorials, monuments, and other sites of memory following periods of mass atrocities. We examine the layers of atrocities within a city's history and the networks of related and layered memory sites. The course is unique globally given the collaboration between an architects and political scientists on transitional justice issues especially with respect to the role of reparations in architecture and planning. After several years of teaching this course, we are developing a related research project. Guest lecturers are practitioners and scholars working on these issues across the planet.

Transitional Justice: Political Science and International Law Perspectives

The affiliated appointment that I have in The School of Law offers the opportunity for me to present my research and teach (limitedly) in the law school. This course is an interdisciplinary course that I co-created and co-taught with Prof. Jenny Moore (School of Law). This course was cross-listed in the UNM School of Law and the Political Science Department. Students included graduate students in Political Science and law students in the School of Law. It is focused on political science and legal scholarship focused on transitional justice with a focus on reparations. We taught this course in Spring, 2014.

The Globalization of Reparations Movements

This course is interdisciplinary in content. I created and taught the course to undergraduate and graduate students in the UNM Program of Africana Studies and the Political Science department. The course focused on reparations efforts across the planet including the African diaspora. I have an affiliated appointment in the Program of Africana Studies. I taught this course during winter session in January 2009.

Non-University Teaching

Prison Justice Initiative, Georgetown University

I was a recurring guest lecturer in Marc Howard's (Department of Government) course (during 2014-2016), World History, which he taught at the Jessup Correctional Facility in its Prison Education program and Georgetown University's Prison Justice Initiative. The correctional facility is a maximum-security prison for men. My class sessions focused on human rights and reparations.
